CANADIAN STUDIES

Look at the symbol of Canadian Studies: an enormous red maple leaf, a tiny fleur-de-lis stabbing up into it. The image suggests rather aggressive nationalism, or perhaps embattled nationalism—the fleur-de-lis recalls the phrase “thorn in the side.”

That symbol is being replaced. Canadian Studies stationery is now banded near the top by a stripe, pure rouge, shading down into the white of the paper, two centimetres deep and wide as the sheet. The stripe is suggestive of Canada in its color and, more subtly, in its breadth, a mari usque ad mare. The red and white are reminiscent of the flag, but they won't incite chauvinist flag-wavers: Canadian Studies wants to be taken seriously.

And so it must. Our frequently described self-consciousness is being converted into serious study. At any rate, the Canadian Studies Committee is earnest; it may take some time to win credibility. That is the opinion of P. Robberecht, Chairman of the Committee: it is not just a matter of a public hesitant to acknowledge itself, its culture and history topics of scholarly interest; traditional scholars of discrete disciplines must accept the interdisciplinary nature of Canadian Studies.

Canadian Studies needs the cooperation of traditional departments, for its own courses will remain few in number. In its turn it does not seek to infringe upon the domains of these departments, but simply uses their resources, and, indeed, whatever resources it can use—the Faculty of Extension, the Collège Universitaire Saint-Jean, the Boreal Institute for Northern Studies—to give its students exposure to a broad range of Canadian topics and issues.

To that end, its program, a four-year special BA, is both flexible and demanding. Students must take a laboratory science, a 200-level English course and a 200-level French course, Interdisciplinary Studies 450 (Canadian Studies), and one Social Science and one Humanities course. They must also have a major, in which they may take as many as eight courses; otherwise they may not take more than three courses in any given department. Courses available are of an enormous variety, and there are interesting combinations possible: one could do native studies, taking courses in Anthropology, History, and Education; one could do literary studies in French and English Canadian literature. Or, of course, one could concentrate on Canadian history and take courses in History, Political Science, and Economics, which many students do now.

And the honors program planned for the near future (say 1978) will be even more demanding, for students will be expected to become fluent in French, whereas now they need only prove their reading knowledge of French. In aid of would-be bilinguals Canadian Studies hopes to be able to draw on bursaries and federally supported immersion courses and exchange programs so that students may study French in Québec in the summer. Faculty exchanges will be encouraged as well; Canadian Studies is fairly new to Canada, and there is always something new to be shared.

Future plans are indeed many, and one of the exciting things about working in the field of Canadian Studies must be that the future can be planned to make the best use of whatever works best. For example, if an aim of the honors program is to give students a second language, why not have them take some courses at the Collège Universitaire Saint-Jean, where all subjects are taught in French? Then, those who study Canadian intellectual history or the arts in Canada (courses now under consideration) will be able to do so with a more appreciative eye for the two founding cultures. Canadian Studies is very ambitious for its students.

And the Canadian Studies Committee is surely one of the most active and conscientious on campus, because of its need to win the respect and consideration of both the academic and student communities and because it must develop programs for which precedents are few: it must prove the merit of looking at ourselves. If that were not enough, Canadian studies as a field is highly self-conscious and much given to self-examination, particularly since the Symon's Report advocated that self-criticism be strenuously practised wherever things Canadian are or should be taught. This has made the Committee especially eager to make the jump between "Canadian content" and Canadian studies, and to make clear that the ideal of the "motherhood issue" can be achieved practically: we as Canadians can "know ourselves." And that is why the Committee, all fourteen members, met every week in the past academic year, not to mention the subcommittees.

Indeed, it has been working with great determination, and very little money, since 1968 when the Faculty of Arts Executive recommended that a program of Canadian Studies be considered. In 1972 the program was approved by the Arts Curriculum Committee, GFC, and the provincial government. The Committee itself since its inception has had the responsibility for planning programs and guiding students, of course, but the University has always given it support, though, as Dr. Robberecht points out, it hasn't been able to give much that is concrete. The Canadian Studies Office is Dr. Robberecht's offices, sans secretary. There is no special room for students, either. Since students of Canadian Studies (and "students" may well include Committee members in this young enterprise) are still discovering the nature of their disciplines, they need space of their own for the exchange of ideas and discussion as well as the more obviously necessary administrative space. Such amenities will perhaps only come with time, however.

Canadian Studies has come a long way in a short time. The Committee has accomplished a great deal with seemingly inexhaustible energy. Though even now you may not be acquainted with the program of Canadian Studies, nor with the Committee, most people on campus are probably aware of the visits by noted speakers such as Mel Watkins and Hugh Faulkner and events such as Land Claims Week, which Canadian Studies has helped to sponsor. As with faculty and students, Canadian Studies actively seeks a close cooperative relationship with the public to bring to its attention issues of importance to the country.

It has come a long way, but it has a good way to go yet. One hopes that great things will follow from the conscientiousness, enthusiasm, and scholarliness with which Canadian Studies is conducted. Canadian Studies is not just a timely pursuit, it is a long-awaited acknowledgement of Canada and Canadians as absorbing and worthwhile objects of attention. And it must be taken seriously.
